

ABSTRACT

[1033] A Sever Communication Channel ("SCC") architecture is described. The SCC architecture provides an abstract base class that describes specific service interfaces called for each service and allows handling of specific protocols for servicing the clients. Worker threads that provide services through different protocols call the specific service interfaces. One application program thereby can implement different protocols for providing diverse types of services such as, for example, scanning services.